But the case of his own son may be more important.

By Mara Leveritt

HARD TIME for the

COP'S KID

David Dill is scared. In a few weeks, he'll begin serving a 30-year sentence for burglary somewhere in the Arkansas Department of Correction. He says he'd rather die than serve that time in protective custody, a system of extra-tight security that's about as restrictive as life on death row.

At the same time, Dill also knows he's a marked man in the prison system if he's not placed under special protection. As Gary Lawson, the sheriff of Perry County put it, "We're talking about sending a boy down there, that if something's not done for him, everybody knows he's dead."

The prospect of entering the Arkansas penitentiary system has made more than a few men sweat. But David Dill has more than the usual reasons for dread. He's slight. Half of his body is held together with pins, and one of his arms is paralyzed, the result of a motorcycle wreck. And then there's the matter of his father.

David Dill is the son of Maj. Larry Dill, head of the Criminal Investigation Division of the Pulaski County sheriff's office, rumored to be one of the meanest lawmen in Arkansas. "Half the men down there from Pulaski County," Sheriff Lawson notes, "Larry Dill has put there."

For years defense lawyers have tried to prove that Larry Dill has demonstrated "a pattern and practice" of abusing prisoners, and for years courts and prosecutors have rejected the evidence as insufficient. But the process has been repeated so often that by now the allegations have taken on a life of their own. Whatever Larry Dill's reputation at the DOC—whether he's known as a tough but honest lawman or as someone capable of beating a prisoner in handcuffs—that is the legacy David Dill will inherit.

David Dill doesn't believe the stories he's heard about his father threatening suspects, sticking loaded guns in their mouths, solving cases by the expediency of coercing a confession. "There's a lot of things come up in the process of these cases," he murmurs. But he also glumly acknowledges, "He's sent a lot of men down there."

Ever since he was convicted along with two other men of operating what police called a "traveling theft ring," David Dill has known he was headed for the pen. He's never been there before, though he estimates he's already lived out five or six of his 27 years in various county jails.

Dill has sandy-colored hair and a thin mustache. His right shoulder, which has a metal plate in it, droops slightly forward. His right arm, strapped into a permanent brace from the elbow down, rests idly in his lap. He looks more like a patient in a rehab program than an outlaw charged with having racked up a string of more than 300 burglaries in less than two months.

"Do you mind if I smoke?" he asks. His

ARKANSAS TIMES • 57

Major Larry Dill, head of the Pulaski County Sheriff's Department's Criminal Investigation Division, has sent many men to the state penitentiary.

This summer, his only son, David, 27 and a career criminal, was taken there. David's scared. His father, ostensibly, doesn't give a damn.

sleepy, almost dreamy-sounding drawl belies the seriousness of his predicament. He lights up with his left hand, takes a shallow puff, and returns again to the subject that haunts him. "Half the people in there is gonna think I'm a snitch 'cause of who my daddy is."

When he speaks again, there's a steely resignation in his voice, like the drooping shoulder with a piece of metal in it. "I guess I'm going. But I'll tell you one thing: I don't want no P.C., no protective custody. If I die in there, I die in there, but I'm not gonna let 'em put me in no P.C."

In the past 25 years, Dill's daddy has carved out for himself one of the highest profiles in Arkansas law enforcement. Maj. Larry Dill's reputation as a dangerous man in the interrogation room goes back decades, to when he was a patrolman with the Little Rock police. In the mid-70s, when some 200 Little Rock policemen were investigated on charges of brutality, Dill's name was one of about eight that kept popping up in testimony. But the rumors remained only that; in the end, federal Judge G. Thomas Eisele, who heard the case, ruled that the defendants had failed to prove their allegations of abuse.

But some of Dill's critics say Eisele didn't hear everything back then. One of them is Little Rock attorney Terrence A. "Les" Hollingsworth.

Hollingsworth, who represented six black defendants who claimed to have been beaten by Dill while they were in custody, describes the officer in those days as "blood-thirsty." He recalls that the men he was defending, who were accused of raping a white woman on an Arkansas River sandbar, told him that Dill and another officer had beaten them.

According to Hollingsworth, they also said that Jess F. "Doc" Hale, the former police chief who is now deceased, was present at the beatings but did not participate. At the time of the alleged incidents, Hale was still a patrolman. Hollingsworth says that when he asked Hale to tell the court what he saw, Hale admitted having witnessed the beatings, but refused to testify against his fellow officers.

Years later, when Hollingsworth served on the Civil Service Commission and Hale was being considered for promotion to chief, the lawyer says he brought up the subject of the beatings and Hale's refusal to report them. Hollingsworth says Hale told him then that he'd always regretted that decision.

Hollingsworth still believes the six men he represented were telling the truth. "I saw the bruises," he says. And he believes the only reason the 1975 suit and subsequent to admit... level."

Dill resigned from the LRPD without fanfare shortly after the inquiry into its operations. He worked briefly as a deputy sheriff and personal bodyguard in his hometown of Searcy, then joined the Pulaski County Sheriff's Department under Sheriff Ken Best.

Later, when former Sheriff Tommy Robinson took over, Robinson elevated Dill to the rank of major and placed him in charge of the department's Criminal Investigation Division. For months after that, the two made headlines with their involvement in—and some would say bungling—of the Ron Orsini and Alice McArthur murders. It was a chaotic time. Robinson and Dill remained at odds throughout most of it with the county's two largest police departments, and before the spectacle ended, a North Little Rock police officer, a Little Rock lawyer, and the county prosecutor had all sued the sheriff and his lead detective for false arrest. More troublesome to certain defense lawyers, however, was the fact that reports of suspects being beaten now began to seep out of the Pulaski County sheriff's office.

There were several such reports, all of which Dill dismissed as either the lies of convicts trying to get their cases overturned or retaliatory machinations of disgruntled ex-employees. Though Dill and his critics differ on some of the particulars, all agree that the arrest of a habitual criminal named Lester A. Clay, Jr., in September of 1983 was a fairly typical night's work.

Dill says an informant, Bobby Toombs reported that Clay intended to burglarize a drugstore on Baseline Road one night, the perform an armed robbery of a Delta gas station on Interstate 30 the next. In order to catch Clay before the armed robbery, where someone could have been hurt, Dill says he authorized Toombs to pose as an accomplice using an unmarked sheriff's department car to drive Clay to the drugstore, where de-investigations failed to prove the legally required "pattern and practice" of abuse in departments where Dill has worked is that people like Hale kept quiet. "Too many real decent people," Hollingsworth says, "are not willing to come out and testify about how big a bastard he is."

Not everyone who knows Dill agrees with that assessment. A longtime Little Rock private investigator says that in his experience, Dill always behaved professionally. A former deputy prosecuting attorney admits, "Maybe the reason we could never get a charge [of abuse] to stick was that he'd never done those things." A Little Rock policeman who says he prefers not to work with Dill acknowledges, "Even so, I've got

...be waiting inside.

Here accounts of that night diverge. When investigators for the Arkansas State Police looked into the incident a year later, Toombs, the informant, told them that deputies had offered him $250 for each burglary he could set up, $500 for each robbery, and a $500 bonus if he could arrange for the criminal to be carrying a weapon so that police could shoot him.

Clay, who received a 20-year sentence for the burglary, told the State Police that he was "enticed" into the crime by Toombs, who even offered to drive him to the store. When he entered the pharmacy, Clay said he heard shotguns being jacked. "They said, 'Freeze!' so I knew what time it was, you know, and froze."

Brad Bennett, now an investigator for the Arkansas State Police who was then a sheriff's deputy at the scene, corroborated Clay's account. Bennett added that after Clay was on the floor, Dill "walked over to the cash register and gathered up a bunch of change and came back over there and shoved it in Clay's front shirt pocket or down in his pants pocket one, I can't remember which."

He continued under oath, "So there's nothing but a bunch of police officers standing around. Dill walks over there, picks up those quarters, and shoves them in his pocket, and says, 'Son of a bitch, you're gonna take this burglary.'"

Bennett testified that Robinson then displayed a small caliber handgun. "So, ah, Robinson walks over there and he goes, 'You all see this weapon, don't you?' He was putting this little .24 [caliber] automatic he got right in his [Clay's] belt. He said, 'You see his weapon?' ... All the detectives, they agree with him 100 percent."

The suspect, Clay, said that Dill then took a shotgun from one of the officers. "He said, 'I'm gonna turn this mother... red,' just like that." According to Clay, Dill was leveling the shotgun at him when a car drove up to the store.

Asked why deputies would have behaved so violently, Bennett, who now works out of the State Police office at Russellville, said, "That is a form of interrogation. I mean, I do not think that way now that I've been educated differently. But that's the way the thinking was then at the sheriff's office..."

Despite the testimony of Bennett, one of the most credible witnesses to speak out against Dill, the prosecutor at the time, Wilbur C. "Dub" Bentley, concluded that the charges against him and the sheriff would be difficult to prove because other officers present that night denied any abuse had

mon. Fairchild's lawyers also had failed to prove their allegations.

who's now 48, says the work and the continual assaults on his reputation are growing tiresome. "I'm on the downhill side. I can tell you that," he says. "It's about to wear me out."

"You work major cases as long as I have, you develop a high profile. Criminal investigation has always been my favorite type of police work. That's my love. But I think that's also the area to where you also draw more of the bad publicity."

Other officers scoff at the rationale. They maintain that good investigators pride themselves on being able to maintain a low profile and that, for some reason, bad publicity doesn't dog other cops the way it has hounded Dill.

Dill contends that he'd have a much lower profile too, except for the fact that a couple of aggressive Little Rock defense lawyers, John Wesley Hall and Jeff Rossensweig, have become obsessed with portraying him as a thug. As Dill sees it, when you've got a strong case on a criminal, the only hope his lawyers have of getting him off is to allege brutality or that the confession was coerced. Add to that the media's penchant for reporting sensational allegations at length and then burying the news when the courts reject the defendants' claims, Dill says, and you get a picture of what he's been up against for most of his career.

"I do a good job, and I do it the way the Supreme Court tells me I should," he says. He pauses, leans back in his chair, his hands behind his head. "But," he adds, "I don't mind having people think that I'm not easy."

Watching the deputy, a person can see where David got his round, open face and sandy colored hair. The drawl's the same too, which is surprising since—despite David's realistic fears because of who his father is—the two men barely know each other.

...and his first wife divorced soon

Today Dill shakes his head when asked about the incident. "Hell," he says, "that car that drove up? That was the owners. Tommy Robinson himself had gone to the phone and called them. It was ridiculous. There was so much printed about that, and it was just a routine case."

Most recently, lawyers representing death-row inmate Barry Lee Fairchild hauled a string of convicts up from the penitentiary to Little Rock to testify that Dill coerced Fairchild into confessing to the murder of a Jacksonville nurse, 2nd Lt. Marjorie "Oretta" Mason. In June, Judge Elsie denied after David's birth. There was a 1964, two years before Larry Dill went to work for the Little Rock Police Department. David's mother raised the boy on a horse ranch in Perry County owned by her father. Larry Dill stayed resolutely away.

Lillian Dill, Larry's mother and David's grandmother, says she never has understood why her son refused to have contact with David, even when he was young. She herself visited him often.

"That little feller has cried to see his daddy," Lillian Dill says. "He's cried all his life to see him." Over the years, she has asked Larry about his unwillingness to form any kind of a bond with his son, but she says, "He don't want to talk to me about him." She pauses, then adds, "I don't know how to explain my relationship with my own child."

Larry Dill hardly saw David until the boy was a teenager, and by then it was probably too late. David Dill chalked up his first arrest at the tender age of 11. It was for public intoxication. He was also found to be in the possession of 1,000 illegally purchased Quaaludes. As he puts it, "I've been in and out of trouble ever since."

The first serious contact the father and son ever had came when David moved to Little Rock at the age of 15, hoping to live with his father. The stay ended in less than a week. David and his stepmother got into a fight and the boy was thrown out of the house. When he tried to move back home to live with his mother, she too refused to take him in. "She'd done give up on him," Lillian Dill recalls. "She told him, 'You made your bed, now lie in it.'"

Lillian Dill took David in to live with her. Even there, whether out of anger or as an attempt to attract the attention of his father, or both, David Dill continued to get into minor forms of trouble.

"I guess I had a little grudge against my dad," he says. "I looked at it like if he wanted to see me, he could have. I mean, he was the law."

Enforcing the law has indeed been Larry Dill's life. Yet, when asked if his father had ever sat him down for a talk, or yelled at him about his activities, or tried to get help for his drug abuse, or simply warned him about where, based on his own experience as a police officer, he could see his son heading, David Dill shook his head no.

In 1982, a month after David's 18th birthday and his father's promotion to head of the CID, David Dill committed his first major crime. He burglarized a Minute Man restaurant. It was a restaurant he was looking, this time he got it. Larry Dill had his son charged with criminal trespass. If he hadn't, he told reporters, "the papers would have ripped me apart."

But if the move to Pulaski County, the burglary, and then the break-in at his father's house were the younger Dill's way of trying to grab something from his father he'd missed in life—some attention, even some paternal anger—he could scarcely have shown up at a worse time. Nineteen eighty-two was the year Alice McArthur was murdered, and the sheriff and Maj. Dill were up to their necks in the case. What's more, Larry Dill was also attending night school at the time, finishing up his degree at the University of Arkansas at Little Rock. He was working on a major in criminal justice, with a minor in psychology.

It doesn't take much psychology to figure

"David, if you'll just get back and live, we'll be a regular dad and son."

out that David Dill was by now over his head in problems. Yet, when he talks of him, the deputy sheriff describes his son's needs at that time only in abstractions.

"You need intervention at an early age," Larry Dill says when asked about his son's drift toward crime. "But we don't have it. I've talked to a lot of parents, and I can sympathize, but I don't have any answers for them. I see it every day now—kids who need something like that. But instead, we've got them stacked up in the penitentiary, where they're not being rehabilitated."

Dill says he hoped at one point to find some form of mandatory incarceration for David, someplace that would provide "strict supervision for boys 10 to 15 years old, with classes and rules like at Boys' Town," but that nothing like that exists in central Arkansas.

"I wish people knew how much I tried to get that boy straightened out," Dill says.

"He was a good kid till he was 16. Then he got into drugs. I don't know why. His mother never asked anyone to show him any favoritism."

Lillian Dill doesn't remember things quite the same way. "He never even asked me about David," she says of her son. "And if I mention him, Larry just gets angry. That's part of the problem. I believe David wouldn't ever have done what he done if he'd had a relationship with his father."

Five months after the break-in at Larry Dill's house, in March of '83, the younger Dill was arrested and charged with robbing at gunpoint the Majik Market in the same block as the house on the Mablevale cutoff where he was living with his grandmother. Again, he seemed to be going out of his way to make his identity known.

The clerk who identified Dill said he'd been hanging around the store all afternoon talking to her, and that she couldn't believe it when he came back that very same day to rob the place. A friend of Dill's testified Dill had shown him a roll of money and bragged that he'd stolen it from the store.

But Lillian Dill stuck up for David, telling police that he had been home with her all night. The charges were dropped, but the break didn't help. By now David Dill was as caught up in his self-destructive spiral as his father was in the McArthur case. There seemed to be no turning back. Within a few months he was arrested again, this time for trying to sell stolen property, and this time the charges stuck. The court sentenced Dill to three years in prison, though all but a month was suspended.

Asked now about that time, David Dill echoes exactly his father's turn of phrase. "I was messed up," he says. "I guess I'm still messed up."

It didn't help that in the midst of his early, serious run-ins with the law, David's mother died of cancer. Though he had never moved back home with her, they had reconciled after he moved in with his grandmother, and both Lillian Dill and David say the death came as a blow.

Then, three years ago, another tragedy occurred, but for a time, at least, it seemed to offer Lillian Dill a little room for hope. David, who'd stayed out of trouble for one of the longest periods of his brief life, was nearly killed when the motorcycle he was riding collided with a UPS truck. For 14 days, he lay fighting for life on a respirator. For the first time, Lillian Dill says, Larry Dill was there for his son.

"That's one thing I'll give him credit for," the officer's mother says. "He was there every night and every day. That's when I thought things were going to turn around. Larry held that boy's hand and cried, and he said, 'David, if you'll just get back and live, same thing as before. Nothing. I'm so dumbfounded in it. It's a complete mystery to me why, except when he thought the boy was dying, the man won't have anything to do with his son."

David, who was unconscious for most of the time his father stayed at his side, barely remembers that he was there. When he finally left the hospital, he went straight back to life as a small-time burglar. "Ever since my mom died, I went off the deep end," he says. "And then since my wreck, I guess I got a bad attitude."

Since then, David's life has continued the pattern he began years ago. He minces few words in describing it. "I got into drugs. I sold drugs. I solicited prostitution. I kicked in doors. I hung around with criminals." Asked why, he looks up almost quizzically. "Excitement? Danger? A wild hair? I don't know what you'd call it. Ignorance, I guess."

"I don't like jail. Believe it or not, I don't like jail. But I'm beginning to wonder. I despise it, but something about it keeps bringing me back."

During the several months David spent in the Pulaski County jail at the end of last year, his father, whose office occupies the same building, never came to visit him. Only the prisoner's grandmother did. On one occasion David told her that he had overheard some men who'd been brought in on drug charges saying, "We've got a way of getting back at Dill tonight, when his son goes to sleep..." That time he was able to get the jailer to move him to another cell.

DAVID DILL WAS RELEASED FROM THE Pulaski County jail in January of this year. In February, word reached Maj. Dill that his son was again wanted, this time on suspicion of burglary.

Larry Dill found it laughable that a one-armed burglar, even with three accomplices, could have committed all the break-ins various law enforcement agencies had charged him with in the few weeks he'd been out of jail. Though he had no doubt his son was guilty of some of them, he was equally sure David couldn't have committed them all.

Since his arrest, David Dill says he has admitted to all of the break-ins he actually committed. But he shakes his head scornfully as he describes sheriffs' departments that he says tried to "clean house" by attributing their unsolved burglaries to him. And he has little more respect for the owners of some of the houses he robbed. David Dill says police reports of burglaries he did commit frequently listed property as stolen that wasn't, presumably, so that the thief and son agree they may have come at it from opposite sides of the law, but their conclusions are basically the same: Even among cops and "respectable" citizens, there's not much honesty in this world.

Despite his doubts about the number of burglaries attributed to him, Larry Dill told law officers in Perry County where they could capture his son. "Yes, I did," he says in a business-as-usual tone. "I turned over information as to where he was staying. I'm the one responsible for them picking him up. And he knows I'm the one."

"And I'll tell you something else. I guarantee you will not find one prosecutor, or one judge, or one political official that will say I did one thing to help him or show him any favoritism."

Not favoritism, not even paternal concern. "I think I've always realized that everyone who comes through here is somebody's son," Dill says, "but if I work a case and that kid goes to the penitentiary, what right have I got to try to get my son off?"

DAVID DILL'S ENTRY INTO THE ARKANSAS Department of Correction has Lillian Dill almost frantic. "It's really got me tore up that it might cost him his life because of the position his dad is in," she says.

Larry Dill also acknowledges the risk. "Oh, I fear for his safety," the deputy sheriff says. "There's people down there that dislike me. You know, I took their freedom away. Any police officer who sends people to prison is going to have enemies there. And, you know, he's got one arm that's paralyzed."

Asked if he'd do anything differently with regard to David if he could, Larry Dill seems to draw a blank. "I don't know," he says. "I might have tried to have a greater impact on him at a younger age." As to why he didn't, the deputy says only, "That's my big guilt trip that I carry around."

David Dill, despite his drooping shoulder and his fear, refuses to criticize his dad. "I still honor him as a father," he says. "I don't blame my problems on anybody but me." Asked why he figures his father has never had anything to do with him, he shrugs. "I guess he don't like kids."

Meanwhile, Lillian Dill has remained faithful to her grandson in prison. She writes letters and visits him and keeps praying, as she puts it, "for God to intervene in Larry's life."

She prays and worries and wonders what it is that has made him so unable to relate to his son. "I sometimes think," she says, "that that job he's been doing all these years has got him so hard-hearted he just don't know how to do it anymore. He's not like other people. He don't know how to care even

CASE SYNOPSIS/EXAMINER CONCLUSION

In 1987, Don Henry and Kevin Ives both teenage boys were placed on some railroad tracks after having been brutally murdered in an attempt to cover up the murder. The allegations are that this cover up was done because of police involvement in the murders of Ives and Henry.

[REDACTED] as to who was involved in the murders of Henry and Ives. On 6-15-94, [REDACTED] was interviewed by Special Agent [REDACTED] of the Little Rock office of the FBI. [REDACTED] during the interview stated that [REDACTED] boys (Henry and Ives).

[REDACTED] Finis Criswell and others in [REDACTED]. Henry and Ives were in possession of a .22 caliber rifle. Henry and Ives were grabbed and were to be given a lesson because they had previously stolen cocaine from the [REDACTED] residence.

EXAMINERS CONCLUSIONS

[REDACTED]

The initial autopsy made no mention of the cause of the death being a gun butt to the head of Don Henry. However when viewing the photos of the bodies of Henry and Ives it is readily apparent that the head of Henry has the clear impression of a gun butt imprint. The bodies were exhumed for a second autopsy once the cover up surfaced. The second autopsy revealed that the cause of death of Don Henry was a gun butt to the head and the cause of death of Kevin Ives was multiple stab wounds to the back and not from having been ran over by a train. [REDACTED] stated that after the boys had been murdered that they were placed on the railroad tracks and covered with a tarp so the engineer could not see the bodies. [REDACTED] [REDACTED] the boys as the train approached. The initial investigation revealed a hiding place in the bushes and numerous cigarette butts in the hiding place.

At the time of these murders in [REDACTED]

Re: Kevin Ives (Deceased)
Don Henry (Deceased)

Dear Ms. Casey:

The purpose of this letter is to supply an overview of investigation on captioned case up to this point in time. Enclosed you will find the following FD-302s:

- 1) [REDACTED] dated March 3, 1994;
- 2) [REDACTED] dated June 15, 1994 and July 6, 1994;
- 3) [REDACTED], dated May 6, 1994.

Investigation in the Little Rock Division has led to polygraph examinations on [REDACTED]. Both resulted in a showing of "no deception" which was verified by FBIHQ. [REDACTED] Finis Criswell [REDACTED]

[REDACTED] was interviewed regarding his knowledge regarding captioned subjects.

captioned [REDACTED]

in the Ives-Henry murder.

Contact with the FBI Laboratory has revealed that semen has been located in the underwear of one of the victims. Caucasian human hairs have been located on the evidence. Blood, capable of being typed, has been located on the victim's underwear, as well as on the victim's shoes.

Victim Don Henry's shirt was found off of his body next to the tracks at the time of the incident. The FBI Laboratory has found human blood capable of being typed on this shirt.

The FBI Laboratory also located various textile fibers on victim's clothing which may have come from a home carpet. Due to this information, a search warrant may be requested for the residence of [REDACTED] for the period of time in question if additional probable cause can be developed.

After reviewing the enclosed FD-302s and the FBI Laboratory summary, it is requested that subpoenas for blood and hair be issued for the following individuals:

[REDACTED]
FBI Little Rock will continue to gather intelligence on captioned matter to include the address for [REDACTED] for the period of time in question.

If you require further assistance in this matter do not hesitate to contact the Little Rock Division.

Sincerely yours,

Robert M. Satkowski

Result of examination:

This report supplements the FBI Laboratory report in this case dated June 2, 1994 and completes the requested examinations. Please refer to that report for a listing of the previously submitted items.

Grouping tests conducted on the human blood identified on Q21 were inconclusive. No blood was identified on Q22.

No semen was identified on Q21 or Q22.

A sample of the bloodstain identified on Q21 has been removed and will be returned with the submitted items.

No hairs or fibers were detected on specimens Q3 through Q5 and Q9.

Human hairs exhibiting Caucasian racial characteristics were found on items of evidence and have been preserved on glass microscope slides and pillboxes for possible future comparisons.

Miscellaneous textile fibers removed from specimens Q6 through Q8 and Q10 through Q22 have been preserved for possible future comparisons.

The Q16 cap has a one inch chevron shaped cut through the foam portion. This cut appears to have been made by a sharp instrument, however, no determination could be made as to the type of instrument used to make the cut. No determination could be made regarding the cause of the other damaged areas present to the Q16 cap.

The submitted items along with photographs taken of Q3, Q4, Q5 and Q9 will be returned to the Little Rock Division under separate cover by registered mail.

Please call Examiner [REDACTED] b7C
[REDACTED] if you have any questions concerning the results of examinations in this case.

CASE SYNOPSIS/EXAMINER CONCLUSION

In August of 1987, two teenage boys were ran over by a train in southern Arkansas. The initial investigation gave the cause of death as having been high on marijuana and passed out on the railroad tracks. However, further investigation has revealed that the two teenage boys were killed prior to being placed on the tracks and that the placing of the bodies on the tracks was a cover-up. This alleged cover-up supposedly involves law enforcement and political officials. In as much as has provided information concerning this alleged cover-up, she was asked to take a polygraph.

EXAMINERS CONCLUSIONS

It is the opinion of the examiner that the examinee's responses to relevant questions were not deceptive (NDI). Those relevant questions and examinee's responses were as follows:

For information of [REDACTED], On August 23, 1987, captioned victims were beaten and placed on railroad tracks after they observed a drug dealer tried to rip off drugs from a drug dealer.

This case has never been solved and appears to be intentionally riddled with rumors. Investigative agencies that have worked in this case include Saline County Sheriff's Department, Arkansas State Police, and Bryant, Arkansas Police Department.

In December, 1993, Sheriff JUDY PRIDEGN requested assistance in investigation into captioned case.

The Little Rock Division has been gathering intelligence on current political corruption in Saline County which will parallel the corruption resulting in captioned victims' deaths.
